Cities Leading: Rethinking Global Governance

Governance is at the heart of the work of the GPM. This year, the debate on governance will focus on empowering cities globally through one message: enough talking and more action. Although many acknowledge the importance of cities in addressing global challenges, cities are too often marginalized in global policy agendas. This session showcases the significance of cities by highlighting the changing role of urban governance in confronting global problems and crises. The session will examine three key priority areas: reinforcing national-local collaboration, building global multi-stakeholder partnerships, and engaging with a wide range of stakeholders to unlock an inclusive recovery and build resilience. The session will also shape the GPM's internal discourses and its positioning towards organizations like the United Nations (UN), UN-Habitat, and Global Taskforce, as well as key events including the United Nations Climate Change Conference (COP), Global Taskforce, and World Urban Forum (WUF).

16.45 - 17.45 Plenary Debate Climate Migration:

Cities as Global Leaders on Climate Migration

In an urbanizing world, cities are the main sanctuaries for the growing number of people affected by climate and environmental change. Cities, as hosts to many migrants, have a mandate and a responsibility to provide for the needs of their residents, including migrants, and to support newcomers' integration. In the absence of global leadership and locally identified protection programs, some cities and nations are facing complete destruction, with developing countries and vulnerable communities being hardest hit by the environmental crises. This session recognizes that climate change is reality and can be slowed but not stopped by the international community's commitments to reducing emissions and transitioning toward renewable energy. As such, we must build resilience and advocate for inclusive adaptation programs by linking local knowledge and global resources through local leaders. This includes seeking out and integrating their local knowledge, expertise and needs into national policy actions, and providing the tools and resources cities need to provide direct services to migrants in their community, regardless of legal status.

Introductory statement by Michele Klein Solomon, Regional Director for Central and North America and the Caribbean, IOM

Urban Pandemic Response: Global Vaccination

The Covid-19 pandemic has highlighted the critical role that cities play in protecting health, not just of local residents, but also of national and global populations. Cities have been on the frontline of the Covid-19 pandemic, and mayors have worked tirelessly to protect their populations. Focusing on global health vaccine distribution, this session explores urban health policies regarding accessibility and affordability of Covid-19 vaccines. The Global Parliament of Mayors believes cities have a powerful role to play in making vaccines and other public health interventions – in particular those which aim to foster broader health and socioeconomic wellbeing – inclusive, equitable, and rooted in the needs of their communities.

Introductory statement by Dr. Nathalie Laure Roebbel, Head, Urban Health, Social Determinants of Health, World Health Organization

16.00 - 16.45 Plenary Debate on Culture:

Re-Imagining Urban Environments

This session of the summit develops a compelling narrative that highlights the necessary steps to be taken by cities in the aftermath of the Covid-19 pandemic. Mayor will discuss the need for new mobilizing projects, including the use of arts and culture, festivals, as well as developing an environment for digital events in the post-pandemic era. With lessons learnt from the pandemic with regards to inequalities, the reconfiguration of public spaces is needed. These efforts should be shaped through participatory processes.

Introductory statement by Dr. Doris Sommer, Director of the Cultural Agents initiative, Harvard University

16.45 - 17.00 Break

17.00 - 18.00 Plenary Debate and Polling on Local Economies:

Resetting our Local Economies

The Covid-19 pandemic has stalled most of the processes upon which globalization thrives and thus, creates the need for significant change. In this session, the discussion explores the resetting of our local economies. It investigates how the pandemic has affected the global economy by mandating a revitalization of more local/localized forms of economic prosperity. Following this line of thought, the session juxtaposes universal services and further addresses the short supply chains and circularity oriented to basic needs. It calls for a new basis for post-Covid redevelopment and social inclusion; development of local enterprises at the neighbourhood level; and rooting for local public service partners.

Introductory statement by John Austin, Director, Michigan Economic Center. Nonresident Fellow Brookings Institution & Chicago Council on Global Affairs
